State Worker List Goes up, Dips Sharply

Employment in Idaho was substantially higher than a year ago in mid-January, but fell sharply during the latter part of the month as sub-zero weather blanketed the state, according to a monthly report on the Idaho labor market.

The usual seasonal curtailment coupled with the severe cold dropped employment at the end of January to what may be the lowest for the winter.

Fluctuation of the potato market caused considerable unemployment among workers engaged in potato sorting.

Job opportunities are limited and labor turnover is slow in Burley, according to the report.

Unemployment in Gooding appears slightly higher than a year ago because of less favorable weather conditions.

In Jerome, there has been a heavier than usual early demand for general farm hands for the agricultural season.

Severe January weather, the worst in years, resulted in almost complete curtailment of agricultural activity in Rupert. Nonagricultural activities were near normal for the season, and fresh potato operations were below normal because of the limited supply of potatoes available.
